

Challenges

In clinical research, the qualification of each individual and of the entire study team determines the success of a trial. Nevertheless, there is often a lack of practical training opportunities for the entire team including the non-medical staff members. Most training programs are directed at investigators and do not address the specific tasks and practical challenges of operational study execution.

- Focus on the operational study team

Lack of training for non-medical staff leads to inconsistent skills and shortfalls in study execution.

- Practice-oriented content

Most available courses target on investigators without offering hands-on knowledge for clinical site teams.

- High qualification levels

Gaps in the skillset and level of information negatively impact study conduct, operational quality, and trial results.

- Experts from practice

Many trainings are centered in clinical trial theory; practical, real-world expert guidance is missing.
